

DOCUMENTATION

Andrew Bonham

Orig. 10 June; Edited 11 June, 2025

It was written by an individual of Texas in the summer and fall months of 2024 that a coordinated liquidation event was taking place in preparation for the assumed market decline, which has been demonstrated this year in the Standard and Poor Index.

Regarding these now proven claims, it has been acknowledged that in 2024 there was a legitimate lack of plausible credibility, given the history, as well as the additional lack of documented evidence. Now, that is not the case.

There is simply a reluctance to question those to whom questions are often called unwarranted or slanderous.

In fact, their legitimate history including successful operations and law enforcement, over many years, does stand in their favor, which is why it is so difficult to repeat the questions that at first seemed unwarranted.

Now, however, that difficulty may need to be reframed as not one of rational thought.

As it stands, claims that before seemed incredible or uncredited, by now evidence verified, are being suppressed by the very people who—sometimes legitimately—complain of media oppression.

Should, therefore, the media suppress the reports that groups in Texas—that may have been politically linked—have not only jointly claimed that the financial laws are completely meritless, but that their concealment of ancillary crimes to facilitate these acts is also warranted?